Austin Bailey
2550099
EECS 665
Lab 4 write-up

1) For languages where white space has more meaning than simply delineating between tokens, tokens have to be made to represent the different white spaces since they determine how the tokens following on that line are interpreted. Specifically, the rules we have written change because the token we read in is contextualized by the amount of white space preceding it, we would have a different token representing each different amount of whitespace.